A GROUP of friends pounded the streets of Portsmouth in their own version of the Great South Run to raise money for a four-year-old cancer sufferer.

It may have been a month after the official event took place, but that did not stop Chris Jones's determination to complete the 10-mile feat.

He was forced pull out the day before October's race because he caught swine flu.

Despite the setback, the 34-year-old from Petersfield was keen to make good on sponsorship pledges for the charity Children with Leukaemia and devised his own version of the route through Portsmouth and Southsea. He chose to run for a charity after his friend's four-year-old son James Restall from Denmead was diagnosed with the cancer in April. James's mum Imogen, who had already completed the official Great South Run in October, joined Chris for the run. Their efforts have raised in excess of £1,000.
